Bridges to Moms Fund

We are pleased to share this update on the impact of your philanthropy at Brigham and Women's Hospital. Now in its sixth year, Bridges to Moms (BTM), under the direction of Roseanna H. Means, MD, continues to provide essential care to pregnant homeless women in Boston. These women face enormous barriers to medical care, which can impact both their and their babies' health. Almost entirely funded by philanthropy, BTM uses gifts like yours to assist women in maintaining healthier pregnancies, strengthening maternal bonding, and gaining household stability. This year, more than 50 women "graduated" from our program, putting their families on a healthier trajectory. Thank you for helping us ensure these members of our community are able to receive the best care regardless of their economic situation.

Giving Families a Healthy Start

BTM meets women where they are, connecting with each woman on an individual basis to understand her personal circumstances and needs. Establishing trust is a key first step—many of our patients are escaping domestic violence or struggling with trauma and other mental health issues. When a patient trusts her doctor, she is more likely to accept help and stick to a treatment plan. Our personal service has yielded positive results, with many women reporting that they feel worthy and seen for the first time, and that they feel empowered to take control of their lives and improve their situations.

One major difference with BTM patients is the high utilization of preventative care. A large percentage of our patients are able to keep their primary care and pre- and post-natal appointments, which help them avoid the emergency room and lead to better, more sustainable health outcomes. As a result, most of our patients are able to deliver at term. Of those who need to spend time in the neonatal intensive care unit (NICU), BTM babies have shorter NICU stays despite higher numbers of complications, an indication of successful preventative care.

Most of our patients are women of color, a group for whom the risk of maternal mortality is five times higher than for white women. BTM has had no maternal deaths during its six years. Many of our patients also experience improvement in their housing situation after a year, which speaks to our team's resourcefulness and advocacy in addressing patient gaps in housing, transportation, food, shelter, and personal safety.

“The personal attention we provide and the services we offer are changing the health trajectory of these families. We see sicker babies but can discharge them at the same rate as typical births. In fact, the work we do results in cost savings for both our hospital and taxpayers by keeping them out of crisis care. Supporting these at-risk women is not only the right thing to do, but also beneficial for our healthcare system.”

Adapting to COVID-19

Due to the COVID-19 pandemic, the BTM team has conducted telehealth visits by phone and video when possible. To reach those who do not have access to such technology, the team redoubled its commitment to meeting patients where they are, making in-person visits while donning personal protective equipment (PPE).

Looking Ahead

Dr. Means is building collaborations with the departments of medicine, women’s health, mental health, newborn medicine, and obstetrics/gynecology at the Brigham. Having a larger coalition within the hospital will broaden the impact of our outreach to a vulnerable patient population.

Dr. Means is also looking to bring more trainees and residents on site visits. The opportunity to see firsthand patients in their everyday environments is invaluable for understanding how social determinants have a real and tangible impact on health.

Thank You

Your philanthropy continues to play a vital role in helping all women get the dignified, compassionate support they need to give their babies the best chance at a healthy start in life. Thank you for helping our most vulnerable patients and their families receive the best care, ensuring that they are on the road to better health and a better life. This is transformative work, and we are grateful to you for helping carry it forward.
